Background

A multi-billion-dollar commercial products corporation had successfully completed the PMI project management methodology training process and was working to introduce the innovation into its project portfolio. Initial results showed that while the methodology was helping to standardize processes, schedules were still slipping, quality continued to be an issue, and product costs remained above target. Management asked PLS to assess the current situation and recommend corrective action.

Solution

After reviewing the data and conducting interviews with key personnel, PLS concluded that the company lacked experienced project managers capable of planning, driving and translating the process into actionable and manageable tasks. The client agreed, and PLS was engaged to mentor current project managers and develop a process for selecting, training, and developing highly skilled project leaders.

Results

In addition to making rapid progress toward on-time, on-budget completion of several longstanding projects, management gained crucial knowledge that will affect all future projects as well. They discovered that mere implementation of a toolbox isn't enough to achieve your desired outcomes; success hinges on the appropriate application of those tools. It requires a seasoned team of managers, team members and skilled project leaders working toward a common objective. It requires a team that understands both the science of process and the art of leadership.
