

Background

A Fortune 500 company required a strong leader for a critical, but long-troubled project. The company had sunk millions of dollars into the endeavor over several years, and had seen four managers come and go within the last twelve months, leaving behind a demoralized team and a project almost hopelessly behind schedule.

Solution

After PLS conducted an initial gap analysis, it was clear that the current path of the project was not going to meet the company's objectives. The project was put on hold while PLS conducted a technical feasibility assessment, which soon revealed that the basic premise of the product specification was incorrect. When the company decided the project was necessary, PLS led the product redefinition, re-staffed several key positions, and reenergized the remaining team members.

Results

PLS led the project through feasibility and into execution before hiring and training a new internal replacement to take over project management.
